Religion, Science, and Empire is also distinguished by its theoretical and methodological interest in issues of categorization and representation, for which J. Z. Smith’s work serves as the launching pad. While Smith has theorized productively about how “map is not territory,” Gottschalk is concerned to illustrate how, when it comes to representations of human beings, the map (the type and quality of the categories/representations we use) can come to powerfully change our perceptions of ...

Religion, Science, and Empire: Classifying Hinduism and ...

In Religion, Science, and Empire: Classifying Hinduism and Islam in British India (Oxford University Press, 2012), Peter Gottschalk, Professor of Religion at Wesleyan University, outlines the contingent and mutual coalescence of science and religion as they were cultivated within the structures of empire. He demonstrates how the categories of Hindu and Muslim were constructed and applied to the residents of the Chainpur nexus of villages by the British despite the fact that these identities ...
